In which paragraph does the author mention
4.1.	early risers' attentiveness pattern?

4.3.	a chemical responsible for our frame of mind?
4.4.	a recurring ailment connected with getting up early?

THE BENEFITS OF GETTING UP LATE

A.

The greatest people and geniuses in the world have one thing in common; they go against the grain. Most people have a sleeping schedule and routing which is not bad but may not be too productive. One research showed that people who deviate from their normal sleep routine are more creative and intelligent. At the University of Madrid, another research carried out on 1,000 students, found that the students who retired late to bed and woke up later on the following day had a higher reasoning ability than those who slept early.

B.

You may tend to imagine that late risers miss out on the morning hours. However, early risers miss out on the entire night! A team of expert researchers collected various saliva samples of 42 volunteers with varying sleeping schedules. After doing an analysis, they found out that early risers had greater levels of cortisol (the stress hormone) than those who slept late and woke up late. Early risers, who have more cortisol, also reported more frequent headaches, which could lead to a bad mood. On the other hand, people who wake up late are more leisurely and less busy, and hence tend to be in a better mood.

C.

When you wake up at 6 a.m., by 9 p.m. you're usually passing out, which means that by 5 p.m. you're extremely tired. Despite starting your day with a burst of energy, by mid-afternoon you'll already be tired. Therefore you cannot work for the second part of the day. Both early birds and night owls had equal levels of productivity after waking up. 10 hours later, early birds scored lower on the brain activity test in the brain regions that are in charge of attention than night owls, who were able to pay attention to a stimulus for a longer time.

THE CONFLICT BETWEEN TWO ARTISTS

Have you heard about Vantablack? It's the blackest artificial substance developed by the scientists at the National Physical Laboratory in the UK and produced by a company called Surrey NanoSystem. The blackness of the substance is so deep that it absorbs 99,9% of visible light. Even 3D objects, when coated with it, look like flat spots without depth. The substance is mainly used in astronomy and for military purposes. But what if you wanted to create a painting or another work of art using Vantablack? A little "less black" version, called S-VIS, was developed for artistic purposes. 5.1. _____ It means that he's the only person in the world who can use it in art. And he has to use it wisely, since the production is extremely limited. It's understandable that other artists were enraged upon hearing about Kapoor's licence. 5.2. _____ But Temple went further than merely voicing his discontentment. In response to the restrictions concerning Vantablack Temple invented a variety of other pigments, including... "the pinkest pink." Temple's pigments, although very strong and visually attractive, aren't a prominent scientific discovery. Still, Temple has put one peculiar restriction on them too. The pigments are available for purchase by everybody in the world... except Anish Kapoor! 5.3. _____ The buyer also has to state that under no circumstances will he give Kapoor even a tiny sample of the pigment. 5.4. _____ It's not as black as Vantablack but can be used by all artists (except Anish Kapoor, of course). It's more economical too, because a bigger quantity of it can be produced for the same amount of money. Well, one thing's for sure. That's a professional revenge!

- A. The substance has been licensed by an artist called Anish Kapoor who then sold his licence to another famous artist Stuart Temple.
- B. Whenever you venture to buy one of Temple's pigments, you're obliged to sign a document stating that you're not Anish Kapoor, nor you are in any relations with him whatsoever.
- C. What's more, Temple was able to gather a group of scientists who developed a substitute for Vantablack, with a slightly different chemical composition.
- D. However, the licence for it was purchased by one man – Anish Kapoor, a well-known, wealthy artist.
- E. The biggest opponent to that fact was an artist called Stuart Temple who accused Kapoor of being egoistic and lacking creativity.

THE WELL

Early in my married life I bought a small country estate which my wife and I looked upon as a paradise. After enjoying its delight for a little more than a year our souls were saddened by a sudden discovery – an insufficient water-supply. It had been a rainy season when we first went there, and for a long time our cisterns were enough, but early this year a drought had set in, so I began to look for a well-digger. Such an individual was not easy to find, for in the region in which I lived wells had become unfashionable; but I was determined to persevere in my search, and in about a week I found a well-digger.

“And now, then,” said he, when we had had a little conversation about terms, “the first thing to do is to find out where there is water. Have you a peach-tree on the place?” We walked to such a tree, and he cut therefrom a forked twig. He took an end of the twig in each hand, and, with the point projecting in front of him, he slowly walked along over the grass in my little orchard. Presently, the point of the twig seemed to bend itself downward toward the ground.

“There,” said he, stopping, “you will find water here.”

“I do not want a well here,” said I. “It is too far from the house.”

“Very good,” said he. “We will try somewhere else.”

His rod turned at several other places, but I had objections to all of them. Finally he stood up and looked at me. “Well sir, will you tell me where you would like to have a well?”

“Yes,” said I. “I would like to have it over there in the corner of the hedge. It would be near enough to the house; and the little house which I intend to build over it would look better there than anywhere else.” He took his divining-rod with a sigh and went to the spot I had indicated. In a few seconds it turned in the direction of the ground. The next day he came with two men and a derrick, and began to dig my well.

My neighbours, all rural people, as it soon turned out, were much more intelligent in regard to water-supplies. One of them, Phineas, took a more lively interest in my operations than did anyone else. Whenever he saw me he told me something about the well. He did not approve of the place I had selected for it. If he had been digging a well he would have put it in a very different place.

Tekst 2.WHAT IS WATERALL?

Arthur Steingart, a student from Arizona, posed a question at a dinner party one night: "What can we create today that simplifies the technology that has been around for a long time?" That conversation led him to create Waterall, an irrigation timer that uses water efficiently. Currently, Steingart is looking for investors needed to fund Waterall, so as to enable its mass production.

The product's timing is essential with increasing water conservation measures imposed in the drought-stricken southwest. California, for example, issued mandatory restrictions on water use. And although Arizona's drought situation isn't as dire as California's yet, officials said the state must still conserve water. Up to 70 percent of the state's residential water supply is used on landscaping. To avoid wasting water through inefficient irrigation systems, the department recommends using "new and emerging" technologies, according to its website.

Steingart said Waterall fills that need, and the idea behind it was to save water for the community as a whole. Its users can manage the water consumption on a computer or with an app on a mobile device. Waterall knows how much water different plants need and waters the garden throughout the day – automatically stopping when it rains.

"It's exactly the same as a standard irrigation timer in the setup," Steingart said. "But it's less difficult to operate. My main goal was to conserve water in an easy way and the complexity of some irrigation controllers has made it difficult to get people to use them."

Steingart told his neighbors about Waterall, and they responded well.

"It's kind of a no-brainer, everybody should have this," said Josh Diaz, 35, who lives near Steingart. "I have three girls in a house with three bathrooms and a pool. We do use a lot of water, so I really have to save as much as possible, whenever possible."
